

Dear Sir or Madam:

The FCC is not a tool of the profit-making broadcasting industry. Satellite radio provides services that are far superior to the local broadcasting available to me in the San Francisco Bay Area. I absolutely insist that you do not cave in to the NAB. They've enjoyed a monopoly for a long time. There was never a choice for Americans until satellite arrived. Through satellite I have access to information--such as constant weather and traffic--that local broadcasters do not provide.

Who has given local broadcasters the right to a monopoly on providing local news, weather, sports, traffic, and entertainment to the citizens of a local area? How can they insist that it's their legal right to monopolize this market, when legal services such as satellite radio can provide listeners with superior quality? It's blatantly un-American, and I insist that the FCC not cave in to this deplorable strategy.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

Brad Rollin
